

Presidents of the Republic of Kratoi

The office of the Kratoi president is the most prestigious in the new republic, representing the will of the people and ensuring that their interests are well represented. The Kratian constitution of 4027 endows the president with the executive power of the country as well as the position of commander-in-chief of the army. Each president is elected by universal suffrage for a 5-year term and traditionally rules for two terms. For better or worse, the president symbolizes the Republic of Kratoi itself and both great leaders and corrupt populists have passed through Kratoi's presidential palace. Without further ado, the presidents of the republic will be presented here.

Reki Hyung

Reki Hyung is the country's first and most popular president for the nation, representing the country's spirit of freedom and independence. An Iskarian by origin, Reki was a renowned rebel leader who fought to free Kratoi from Ustilian rule. Her charisma and sincerity as well as the secret support of the Pact earned her the revolutionaries' choice as the country's first president. During her first term she spent her time writing the country's constitution, collaborating with all political factions and drawing inspiration from the old Ustilian constitution to draft a fundamental law for the country that would codify the separation of powers, universal suffrage, religious freedom and numerous liberties for the people. This constitution was extremely progressive for its time and while there was opposition from the wealthy merchants and the old nobility, Reki's extreme popularity as well as the secret manipulations of the Pact allowed her to pass the constitution, which remained the fundamental law of the republic during the rest of its existence.

After this first term, Reki ran in the country's first free elections and won by an absolute majority, receiving the confidence of the people to pursue her reformist goals. In her second term she would modernize the army to ensure the country's protection and promoted industrialisation to bring Kratoi up to the level of its more advanced neighbors. After finished her second term as the most popular ruler in Kratoi's history, she chose to leave politics, retiring after a decade in power. This would set the precedent that each president would only rule for two terms to honor Reki's will, who wanted to avoid any one person staying in power for too long.

Rezeda Valdei

Rezeda Valdei was the second president of Kratoi, ruling from 4035 to 4045. A veteran politician of ustilian origin, Rezeda previously held the post of foreign minister and was renowned for her diplomatic skills. She ran for election as a moderate and conciliatory candidate as part of the newly created Kratian Nationalist Party rather than an independent as Reki did before her. This political party was founded by political allies of Reki and had secret support from the Pact. The party was formed in response to the growing political power of the Kratian elites, who were considered by party members to be a threat to the republic because of their dislike of the country's democratic ideals and their potential affinity towards Ustilus.

Rezeda won the election with a respectable majority and her term of office was known for its brilliant foreign policy, achieving good relations with Mazarin, Iskaria and the newly unified Shinri state. These alliances helped Kratoi establish good trade routes free of Ustilian control to ensure the nation's economic security. She also signed treaties of friendship and collaboration with several Elven communes bordering the country, who would later be added as protectorates. One feature of her foreign policy that would not please the more liberal wing of her party was her reluctance to spread the nation's democratic ideals to the rest of the world so as not to damage her relationship with authoritarian states such as Mazarin or Iskaria. Even so, she would end her term in office with good popularity and left Kratoi in a strong geopolitical position.

Akuchi Touza

Akuchi Touza was an economist and politician of Fulagasi origin who served as president of Kratoi between 4045 and 4050. Before reaching this position she served in the Reki and Rezeda cabinets as minister of economy earning recognition for her good management of the new country's finances and her creation of the Kratian Central Bank. She also held a high position in both the Pact and the Kratoi Nationalist Party and was considered by many in the opposition as the shadow leader of Kratoi due to the high influence she possessed. After Rezeda finished her two terms she ran as the Nationalist Party candidate and based her campaign on stability and continuity, emphasizing her party's achievements in the creation and good governance of the country. In the 4045 elections the opposition to the government came together and created a new party named the Federalist Republican Party. This party advocated greater decentralization for the country and defended the interests of the Kratian middle classes, business elites and landowners, criticizing the growing authoritarianism of the Nationalist party. Nevertheless, the Nationalists won the elections and Akuchi became president of the country.

Akuchi's government broadly followed the same policies as Rezeda's but with greater emphasis on the country's economic policy. She encouraged foreign investment in other nations to increase Kratoi's influence as well as taking advantage of the good trade agreements negotiated by Rezeda to position Kratoi as a strong economic power. Regarding domestic policy she lowered taxes on small businesses and undertook a policy of nationalization of the country's important resources in order to reduce the influence of her political rivals. During her term there were several protests by Federalist-aligned groups because of the increasing centralization of the country and the lack of Kratian representation in the government since many high positions were occupied by Ustilian exiles related to the Pact and the old Reformist Party from the empire, but her good management made the majority of the common people to be satisfied with her government.

However, shortly before the elections of 4050, one of the biggest scandals that would affect the young republic was uncovered. Investigations by independent journalists proved that large-scale electoral fraud was taking place in the country orchestrated by the Pact to favor Nationalist candidates in numerous regional and federal elections. This was an irreparable blow to the credibility of both Akuchi and her party. She initially tried to deny these accusations, labeling them as lies promoted by the opposition, but it was all in vain. The Federalist Party took advantage of this situation to support large anti-government protests, calling Akuchi "The Old Witch of the South" and strongly calling for her resignation. She would remain in office until the 4050 elections and while the Pact was tempted to use electoral fraud to guarantee another Nationalist victory the senior leaders of the organization preferred to respect the democratic order and avoid a civil war. With no other alternative and seeing the looming electoral disaster Akuchi declined to run for office and retired from politics. She would return to work in the Kratoi public sector as a civil servant and would hold several more discreet positions in important corporations in the country, preferring to keep a low profile and not get involved in the looming political struggles.

Farrant Deverdin

Farrant Deverdin was the fourth president of Kratoi, holding office between 4050 and 4054 and as ironic as it may seem the first to actually be of Kratian origin. A very influential figure in the young country who previously held the position of Kratian representative in the Ustilian parliament, Farrant was one of the founding members of the Federalist party and a strong critic of the Rezeda and Akuchi administrations. He won the 4050 elections with a slim majority due to strong popular discontent towards the Nationalist party over the Pact electoral fraud scandal and his victory signified the first peaceful transfer of power between the ruling party and the opposition, a major achievement for Kratian democracy. Farrant promised to fight corruption in the country and to defend Kratian interests against an administration he saw as dominated by foreigners. While his intentions were noble and he had a strong conviction to improve the country, his confrontational and arrogant attitude earned him many enemies among the Pact senior leadership, making his government doomed to fail from the very beginning.

Farrant Deverdin's administration was remembered for constant internal struggles between his government and Congress, the main legislative body of the country which was dominated by the Nationalist party. There were government shutdowns and endless political fights, and Farrant's decision to put the leaders of the Pact on trial for electoral fraud earned him the hatred of the Nationalist party and its supporters, who considered that he was persecuting the party for political motives. The lack of a resolution to this trial caused him to receive criticism from his own party, who saw him as a weak leader incapable of eliminating corruption. While his government is best remembered for all the political problems, it also had its good things. Under president Farrant a process of Kratian cultural renaissance begun with government encouragement in order to create a strong cultural identity for the country and separate it permanently from the Ustilian influence. His administration dedicated a portion of the budget to build several theaters, museums and monuments to honor the rich history and traditions of Kratoi, a feat for which he is well remembered to this day.

However, these political problems were extremely convenient for the empire of Ustilus, which saw the weakness of Kratoi as an opportunity for conquest. In 4054 the empire of Ustilus used a flimsy pretext of territorial claims to invade several islands in the Hesperian Ocean belonging to Kratoi, achieving a quick victory over the republic. This military defeat was a serious blow to the Farrant administration and the Kratian army, which was aligned with the Nationalist party, pressured the president to resign. Farrant finally gave in to their demands and decreed a state of emergency, resigning from his office and handing over all government authority to a high military council led by the renowned general Sylvain Linares. This move was labeled by critics as a soft coup, but this decision had great popular support due to the fear of a full-scale Ustilian invasion. After leaving office Farrant returned to his hometown and died shortly thereafter of an illness attributed by many to the stress of office, although rumors say that the Pact poisoned him as political retaliation.

Sylvain Linares

Sylvain Linares was a Kratian military officer who served as president of the country from 4055 to 4065. Renowned in his youth for his revolutionary fervor , Sylvain was one of the first recruits to join the Kratian rebel militia during the country's war of independence. Thanks to his heroic military feats in addition to his great leadership skills he ascended quickly in the country's army until he became the army's chief of staff in 4049. General Lainares entered the political arena after President Deverdin relinquished his duties to the army during the Ustilian invasion of the western Kratian islands. He would lead the country during this emergency and while he restricted many civil liberties to defend the country his administration was able to stop the invasion and prevent the empire from ever entering Kratian territory. While others would attempt to perpetuate themselves in power after this emergency Sylvain relinquished his dictatorial powers when the war ended and called elections in 4055, running as the candidate of the Nationalist Party due to his ideological affinity with them. The enormous popularity enjoyed by Sylvain for his actions during the emergency allowed him to win with an overwhelming majority and he would begin his first term in office.

The general focused his administration on ensuring the security of Kratoi, modernizing the Kratian fleet and investing in chi foundries to provide the army with new and better weapons. He also created a telecommunications system for the country using sending-stone technology and invested heavily in roads to make the country more connected than ever before. All of these reforms were a huge expense for the country and were financed by a general tax hike that especially impacted the country's wealthy, earning him the enmity of the Kratan elites.

While his first term was very controversial, Sylvain had enough popular support to win the elections again. During his second term he continued with the projects undertaken in his previous government and laid the foundations for the modernization of the country. However, the president began to be criticized for his authoritarianism and tendency to use the powers of the state to censor the press critical of him. Because of his experience as a military leader he expected nothing but absolute obedience from his subordinates and was intolerant of dissenting opinions. This attitude caused him to expel several politicians from the party who were considered potential successors to his position, causing the party to become increasingly personalistic and centered around himself. While this attitude made him more unpopular among the middle and upper classes, he had great support from the poor and workers because of his closeness to the people. He was known to visit villages and towns throughout Kratoi and listen first hand to the problems of the people, an action that further boosted his popularity. For the 4065 elections he planned to run again but a serious illness prevented him from going ahead, forcing him to retire from politics. Sylvain's departure left a stronger Kratoi than before but ended up causing numerous internal struggles within his own party to fill the power vacuum caused by his retirement. Sylvain would spend his last years in the company of his family and wrote an autobiographical book recounting the events of his long and complicated life, which enjoyed considerable popularity in the country.

Gustav Schkreld

Gustav Schkreld was the sixth president of Kratoi, serving as president from 4065 to 4075. Born into a prominent Kratian business family, his father was the chairman of the Kratian Lumber Consortium and Gustav would eventually inherit this position upon his retirement. From a young age Gustav was noted for his business skills and during his time as chairman he greatly increased the Consortium's wealth and influence to the point of monopolizing the entire lumber sector in the country. His family was among the founding members of the Federalist party and Gustav used these political contacts to obtain beneficial deals for his corporation in provinces ruled by the Federalists. He was a high-profile opponent of the Akuchi and Sylvain presidencies due to tax hikes and excessive regulation of his sector, commenting on occasion that he was interested in entering politics to correct what he saw as excessive state authoritarianism. His opportunity would come in the 4065 elections where a divided Nationalist party left him in a perfect situation to run as a candidate. Employing a populist strategy and supported by several popular newspapers belonging to his political allies he ended up winning against all odds against the Nationalists and once again the Federalists entered the government.

Gustav was known during his terms of office for his libertarian economic policy, lowering taxes, removing regulations and privatizing multiple state enterprises in order to make them more efficient. He also continued the infrastructure projects of the Linares government and took credit for some of them to increase his popularity. Gustav also achieved a remarkable improvement of relations with the Ustilesse empire, reopening trade relations and achieving greater cooperation. These actions were unwelcome to the Pact but were a relief to a section of the population already fed up with the militaristic policies of previous governments.

Gustav's government brought remarkable economic growth to Kratoi and the booming economy gave him victory again in the 4070 elections. This growth came at a price as those who benefited most from it were the Kratian elites and inequality began to increase sharply in the country. Another very controversial policy of Gustav's government was his lack of attention to the illegal logging and pollution, which only worsened during his long term in office. Gustav's government and that of his successor Alexis Krezier would be remembered as the years of boom and bust where great fortunes could rise and fall in just a few years. When Gustav finished his two mandates he returned to his previous position as chairman of the Lumber Consortium and left behind a country much richer but at the same time more unequal and burdened by environmental degradation and corruption.

Alexis Krezier

Alexis Krezier was a prominent businessman who served as the seventh president of Kratoi from 4075 to 4079. He shared a long-standing friendship with Gustav Schkreld and held influential positions within the Lumber Consortium. During Gustav's tenure he held various ministerial portfolios and served as his vice president. His presidential campaign aimed to continue the policies of his predecessor, capitalizing on the previous government's popularity and the nation's favorable economic conditions. Despite being perceived as a lackluster and uncharismatic candidate, Alexis narrowly secured victory due to the achievements of his predecessor. One of Alexis' primary electoral promises was to sustain Kratoi's prosperous economic development and he initially delivered on this pledge. However, his administration faced severe criticism for its close ties to influential business interests, leading many opposition members to assert that the republic had been sold out to the economic elite and accusing the president of being little more than a puppet of Gustav Schkreld and the Lumber Consortium.

In 4079, a scandal of immense magnitude erupted threatening the very foundations of the republic. A renowned prosecutor named Judith Linares, daughter of former president Sylvain, initiated an investigation that unveiled an extensive network of bribery, money laundering and tax fraud involving numerous high-ranking officials from the ruling party and influential corporations, most notably the Lumber Consortium. Initially, the government attempted to suppress these discoveries, denouncing them as baseless lies concocted by the opposition. However, as more evidence emerged, public discontent towards the government surged, resulting in widespread anti-corruption protests. President Alexis, in a bid to quash the protests, labeled the revelations as a conspiracy orchestrated by the Pact to overthrow the Federalist party, a move which only made the situation even worse.

The tipping point occurred when Prosecutor Judith uncovered evidence of a massacre of elves perpetrated by lumberjacks associated with the Lumber Consortium which was covered up by the government. This revelation amplified the voices of dissent, pushing the opposition to successfully impeach against the president thanks to the support of independent congressmen and even members of the Federalist party angered with the rampant corruption. Subsequently, President Alexis dramatically fell from grace and faced a trial for his involvement in the corruption scandal that unfolded during his presidency. Deserted even by his once-close friend Gustav, who distanced himself from the conspiracy, Alexis ultimately took his own life leaving the truth buried with him. Speculation abounds as to whether he really committed suicide or someone else did the job for him, but nevertheless this is how one of the nation's most infamous presidents met his ignominious end.

Judith Linares

Judith Linares was the eighth president of Kratoi and the youngest in the nation's history, holding office from 4080 to 4083. As the daughter of the beloved former president Sylvein Linares she gained immense popularity for her role as the prosecutor who exposed a massive corruption scandal which led to the downfall of the previous government. Running under the Nationalist party like her father before her, Judith symbolized hope and the prospect of genuine change for Kratoi. Her youth, charisma, and distinguished professional career propelled her to become the most beloved politician at the time, resulting in a resounding electoral victory and a return to power for the Nationalist party after nearly fifteen years of Federalist rule.

One of Judith's initial political moves was the establishment of a special prosecutor's office with nationwide jurisdiction to investigate corruption and organized crime. Furthermore, she implemented the Natural Conservation Law, a pivotal policy decision that safeguarded specific natural sites as protected areas, prohibiting both environmental degradation and resource exploitation. To address the tensions arising from the discovered massacre of elves Judith successfully renegotiated treaties with the elven protectorates, assuring them that justice would be served and granting them the authority to establish their own police forces to defend their territories. Judith possessed unwavering convictions and a determined political will, even in the face of formidable opposition. From the outset, she aimed to expose Gustav Schkreld's involvement in government corruption and put him on trial for his crimes.

However, the lack of evidence and Gustav's formidable legal team proved to be significant obstacles. Suspecting that corruption ran deeper and involved more powerful forces, Judith encountered repeated instances of evidence suddenly getting destroyed and tragic accidents befalling key witnesses. Against the advice of her allies, she personally engaged in investigations and placed herself in precarious situations to uncover the truth. Unfortunately, Judith's fortune took a turn for the worse when she was gravely wounded by multiple gunshots during a public speech. The assailant turned out to be a deserter from the Kratian army and before his motives could be ascertained he died under mysterious circumstances, spawning numerous conspiracy theories. With Judith's untimely demise her presidency, the shortest in Kratoi's history, came to an end.

Her funeral drew immense public mourning, and the vice president, Isembert Florin, assumed government responsibilities until the next elections. Tragically, Judith's sudden death resulted in the investigation against Gustav stalling due to lack of evidence. Ironically, the former president did not experience much freedom for long as shortly after this news, Gustav Schkreld met his demise in a hunting accident where he was crushed by a falling tree in an act of poetic justice. Although Judith's life was cut short, her profound impact on Kratoi's history and future endured for decades to come.

Isembert Florin

Isembert Florin was the ninth president of Kratoi, holding office from 4083 to 4090. A veteran politician who had previously run for the presidency multiple times, he was known for his pragmatic and moderate approach standing in contrast to the idealism of former president Judith Linares. He assumed the presidency following the sudden assassination of his predecessor, entering office in a period of heightened political tension and instability. Despite inheriting a deeply divided country with a growing trust in institutions, Isembert endeavored to unite the nation once more.

While Isembert won the 4085 elections without much difficulty during his first term, he confronted one of the most significant trials in the republic's history. Poor investments made during the Federalist governments, coupled with a speculative bubble surrounding the shares of the Western Seas Company—a trading company with overvalued assets—led to the bubble bursting in 4086. This event triggered a severe economic crisis, resulting in numerous corporate bankruptcies and the loss of savings for many citizens. The crisis of '86 persisted throughout Isembert's tenure and left an indelible mark on his presidency. His government controversially opted to bail out several key corporations to prevent their complete collapse, a decision that drew criticism from the more progressive faction of his party which accused him of aligning with the powerful and disregarding the interests of the people. Despite these objections Isembert stood his ground, advocating for austerity measures to stabilize the country's finances. These policies, however, came at the cost of significant cuts in government services and increased taxes. Although the country managed to avert economic ruin and gradually began to recover, the crisis resulted in widespread unemployment and discontent with the government.

Seizing the opportunity presented by public dissatisfaction, Kesenia Revilo, a charismatic politician from Isembert's own party, positioned herself as a champion of the people against an oppressive government. Her relationship with Isembert deteriorated to the point where she was expelled from the Nationalist party, a result she secretly desired. Kesenia formed a new party called the Sovereign People's Movement and gathered political allies from the Nationalist party's progressive wing. In the 4090 elections she challenged her former ally Isembert and against all odds emerged victorious, breaking the two-party system dominated by the Nationalists and the Federalists. Isembert retained leadership of his party but after suffering another electoral defeat in 4095 he eventually withdrew from politics, leaving the Nationalist party without a capable leader or a clear direction. This further exacerbated the party's disarray and uncertainty about its future.

Kesenia Revilo

Kesenia Revilo was the tenth and longest-serving president of Kratoi, ruling from 4090 to 4105 and becoming the first to remain in power for three terms. Kesenia's close friendship with Judith Linares dated back to their university days, and both were members of the progressive wing of the Nationalist party. Kesenia, in particular, stood out for her confrontational attitude and aversion to the unwritten rules of politics. After her expulsion from the Nationalist party due to a political dispute with President Isembert, she founded the Sovereign People's Movement, a new party with a populist-leaning agenda. Her party promised to end the two-party system and combat poverty and inequality that plagued the country. Popular dissatisfaction with traditional political parties, stemming from the crisis of '86, fueled her surprising victory in the 4090 elections. While this was a momentous event for Kratan democracy, Kesenia faced challenges with a Congress and Supreme Court dominated by figures sympathetic to the traditional parties, both of which greatly limited her influence.

During her first term, Kesenia advocated for a more conciliatory approach. While continuing some of Isembert's economic policies, she initiated a cash benefit program for the unemployed and implemented successful programs aimed at improving literacy and education in the country. These decisions garnered enormous popular support, and the nation's post-crisis economic recovery further bolstered her standing. However, her administration faced constant fights with both the Nationalist and Federalist parties, who obstructed many of her more radical initiatives and attempted to sabotage her government. While these conflicts could have spelled the end of a presidency, as seen with former President Farrant, Kesenia used her masterful communication skills to cast herself as a rebel fighting against the oppressive establishment. Her leadership skills and popularity led many former Nationalist party voters to migrate to her new party, resulting in another victory for her in the 4095 elections.

During her second term, Kesenia Revilo's party gained control of Congress, thereby securing control over two branches of government. Seizing the opportunity presented by the post-crisis economic growth, she implemented two landmark measures that would shape her presidency: the establishment of a public education system and the founding of a national pension system. Although the Federalists criticized these initiatives as excessive public expenditure that amounted to little more than vote-buying, they were widely celebrated by the ordinary citizens of Kratoi. As her power grew, Kesenia also strategically placed members of her family in influential positions within the military, politics, and the media, further augmenting her influence within the upper echelons of Kratoi society. These appointments drew accusations of nepotism and were challenged before the Supreme Court. However, after a lengthy court battle, Kesenia controversially utilized her presidential powers to pass a law expanding the size of the court allowing her to appoint judges sympathetic to her cause. This move was met with strong opposition from rival parties, yet Kesenia's overwhelming influence rendered any resistance largely ineffectual.

A lesser-known aspect of Kesenia's power was her secret leadership of the Pact, a secret organization that enabled her to manipulate events and undermine potential rivals through her extensive spy network. This covert involvement in the Pact allowed Kesenia to exercise control from the shadows, consolidating her authority even further. Internationally, her foreign policy stance generated considerable controversy, particularly her confrontational attitude towards Ustilus and her commitment to spreading the democratic ideals of the Republic throughout the world. Consequently, the Empire perceived Kesenia as a threat to its authority, leading to strained relations between Kratoi and Ustilus.

In 4100 Kesenia Revilo made the highly controversial decision to run for a third term in the presidential elections, breaking with the precedent set by her predecessor, Reki. This move further fueled concerns among many that Kesenia was becoming an authoritarian leader. A newly formed opposition party, known as the Kratoi Restoration Alliance, emerged and garnered support from both the Nationalists and the Federalists. Kesenia wasted no time in branding the Alliance as an Ustilian proxy, highlighting the Ustilian origins of several of its founders along with their pro-Ustilian attitudes. The ensuing presidential campaign was marked by constant personal attacks and lies spread by both the government and the opposition, yet Kesenia managed to secure another victory, albeit by a narrow margin, commencing her third term in office. During this new government the continent experienced a period of intense political instability triggered by the Crimson Revolution in Klonum, which subsequently gave rise to revolutionary movements on an international scale. The Crimsonites orchestrated the assassination of Mazarin's King Kuril III, plunging Mazarin into civil war and placing the northern border of Kratoi at risk. Kesenia deftly navigated these turbulent conflicts, striving to present Kratoi in the best possible light. She even supported a Kratian military peacekeeping operation to Mazarin led by her adopted daughter Kuvira. In an ironic twist of fate Kuvira herself seized control of Mazarin in 4104, further expanding the influence of the Revilo family. However, Kesenia's triumph was short-lived as in 4105, the same year as the election, she tragically perished in an airship crash within Mazarin territory. Speculation surrounding her death abounds, but the fact remains that this marked the end of the reign of the most simultaneously adored and despised president in Kratoi's history.

Damyan Revilo

Damyan Revilo was a politician and government official of Mazarine origin who would assume the presidency of Kratoi between 4105 and 4109, becoming the eleventh and final president of Kratoi's First Republic. Renowned as a democratic activist in his homeland, Damyan was forced into exile due to his opposition to the monarchy and found refuge in Kratoi through a political asylum program. He first met his future wife Kesenia at a conference on diplomatic relations between Kratoi and Mazarin when she was still in the early stages of her political career. Damyan was captivated by her charisma and strong political convictions, eventually leading to their marriage. They had five children together and also adopted an orphan from Mazarin. Damyan always stood by Kesenia's side and served as her vice president throughout her multiple administrations. He used his administrative skills to ensure the efficient functioning of the government and to implement Kesenia's ideals in a practical way. However, tragedy struck when Kesenia died unexpectedly in an airplane crash, forcing Damyan to step into the political arena to fill the void left by her. Damyan was woefully unprepared for the challenges facing the country as he lacked the charisma and cunning to lead the country in its most trying time.

In the same year as Kesenia's death the Republic faced its most divided elections in history. In addition to the confrontation between the Sovereign People's Movement and the Kratoi Restoration Alliance the elections became even more polarized with the emergence of the Kratoi Crimson Revolutionary Party, an extremist group aligned with the Crimson Revolutionaries advocating for the abolition of private property and classless society. In an election featuring five parties Damyan advanced to the second round as the candidate with the highest number of votes, facing off against Rolan Greverei, the candidate for the Kratoi Restoration Alliance, a pro-Ustilus populist party that based its campaign on linking Damyan to the Crimson Revolutionaries. In the most tense and closely contested elections in the country's history Damyan secured victory by a tiny margin, prompting the opposing candidate to claim electoral fraud orchestrated by the Pact. Following a judicial process that reached the Supreme Court, Damyan was eventually declared innocent and inaugurated as the eleventh president of Kratoi.

Damyan's government had to grapple with the rise of the Crimson Party in Congress, occasionally requiring him to compromise with them to pass certain laws. This drew vehement criticism from the Alliance, which began fear mongering that Kratoi would succumb to the Crimson rebels. Damyan attempted to calm these concerns, but alleged Crimson attacks on farms near the Ustilian border made many Kratians fear about the country's safety. Ustilus itself started militarizing the border with Kratoi and issued warnings that if the republic did not resolve its issues with the Crimsonites Ustilus would take decisive action. Unfortunately, Damyan found himself ill-prepared for the most crucial moment in Kratoi's history and although he made every effort to bring about peace, tensions with Ustilus only escalated. While Ustilus consistently denied any plans to invade Kratoi, a sudden terrorist attack resulting in the deaths of several Ustilians prompted the empire to declare an "Exceptional Military Intervention" to "eliminate the Crimson plague in Kratoi," launching a large-scale invasion of the Republic. As part of this operation, Ustilus deployed its secret agents in the Kratian capital to assassinate several high-ranking officials starting with the president himself. While the brave actions of the Damyan's children managed to save the capital from this attack and apprehend the assassins, they were unable to save the president in time and he was assassinated by Ustilian forces.
